(U) Suspicious Vehicle Fires

(U//FOUO) Suspicious vehicle fires could be an indication of a failed or misfired vehicle-borne improvised explosive device, as demonstrated by the failed bombing in Times Square, New York City, in May 2010. In addition to vehicle fire smoke and fire hazards, first responders should be sensitive to indicators that might point to a terrorist attack, particularly one intended to lure first responders to the scene and target them.

(U) Potential Indicators of Suspicious Vehicle Fires

(U) Although a single indicator may not be suspicious in itself, combinations of the following indicators should raise concerns, depending on specific facts or circumstances:

- (U) A vehicle fire in an unusual location, such as within damage radius of critical infrastructure, near symbols of government (courthouses, city halls, post offices), near symbols of authority (police stations, fire stations, military recruiting offices), near transportation nodes (railroads, airports, bus stations, ports), or in areas of high pedestrian traffic.
- (U) A vehicle occupant fleeing the scene or behaving suspiciously just before a fire occurs.
- (U) Leakage of an unknown or out-of-place substance from the interior of a vehicle.
- (U) Fire in the vehicle's passenger compartment or trunk; vehicle fires typically occur in the engine compartment.
- (U) Sparking, flashing, or popping sounds coming from inside the vehicle.
- (U) Odors emanating from a vehicle other than those typically encountered during a vehicle fire.

(U) Schematic of vehicle used by Times Square bomber

(U) Recommended Actions: If a vehicle fire seems suspicious, first responders and firefighters should:

- (U) Immediately evacuate civilians from the scene.
- (U) Modify tactics based on existing fire department protocols.
- (U) Consider extinguishing the vehicle fire from a distance, with an unmanned water delivery system or foam.

(U//FOUO) For additional information on the Times Square Incident, see FBI-DHS Joint Homeland Security Note "(U//FOUO) U.S. Citizen Arrested in Connection with Attempted Times Square Bombing," 4 May 2010.
